Editor: There is something in the wind about Cuba. The hushed-up reports of rebel landings may not be accurate down to the last detail, but obviously some plan is being carried out.

I do not believe that President Johnson would countenance these activities—possible prelude to invasion—unless he felt there was a good chance of success.

This chance, in turn, would rest on the degree of disenchantment among the Cuban people with Castro's regime. From what I have read, Castro has strong, but not unanimous, support among the people. I do not think there is enough internal unrest in Cuba to make an invasion successful.

So this puts me in disagreement with the President, the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the CIA; well, I'm a free citizen of a free country.

Mark my word, there will be the devil to pay if there is an invasion.
